A Non-Fatal Attraction

One afternoon, Simon Parkes summoned me to his lair on the west side of Manhattan. In this nearly sacred place, where he perfected his rising talent as a painter, he spoke of a proposition that he believed I would find intriguing.

I entered a grand space that was oddly familiar—almost as if it were re-created from my imagination’s conception of an eccentric artist’s studio. The indefatigable Mr. Parkes retrieved paintings from racks that encircled the entire room, and I was treated to a private showing of the works he deeply admired and had collected over the course of his lifetime. The paintings were by Elihu Vedder, and most were executed in Italy. They were curious paintings, but I was not overly impressed, and so I hesitated when Simon proposed an exhibition. Simon is someone I respect both as a conservator and as a person with an admirable, holistic understanding of art. If Vedder’s works compelled him to collect them almost exclusively over the span of decades, then I felt I must come to understand what could inspire such passion. I asked for all of the canvases, about fifty, to be sent to my gallery.

Eight of my choices were hung in one of our showrooms. These intriguing paintings did not aspire to the grandeur of Bierstadt or to the atmospheric command of Gifford. They were dead honest: quint-essential expressions of place, whether the Italian countryside or a village, at dawn, dusk, or in between. Vedder felt no need to exaggerate or to resort to artistic device. His perfect compositions expose the essence of a scene and are brilliant because they possess undeniable integrity. This sort of expression is an achievement on par with those of other great American masters, but perhaps it is a bit more difficult to recognize; however, once Vedder’s visual language is understood, it evokes sensations not unlike those felt in the presence of a haunting Blakelock or an ethereal Inness. Vedder’s work is not a symphony but rather a melody that the mind gradually absorbs and recalls later to impart a sense of well-being—a purpose that is as enviable as any other emotional response that paintings by other greats may provoke.

I thank Simon for introducing me to an artist whose work now resounds in my mind. I invite you to experience Italy through the art of Elihu Vedder, his influences, and other great American painters.

MYTH AND REALITY Elihu Vedder and American Painters in Italy

With its storied history, picturesque landscapes, and colorful inhabitants, Italy has long captured the attentions and imaginations of American artists.¹ Since 1760, when Benjamin West became the first American artist to visit this ancient land, Italy has played host to myriad American painters and sculptors. As the nineteenth-century art historian Henry Tuckerman wrote, “A visit to Italy is perhaps more of an epoch in the life of an American artist than in that of any other. The contrast between the new and old civilization, the diversity in modes of life, and especially the more kindling associations which the enchantment of distance and long anticipation occasion, make his sojourn there an episode in life.”² The duration of this “episode” varied greatly from artist to artist. Some were casual “Grand Tourists,” taking in only the prescribed landmarks of Italy en route to other destinations, while others—for whom a brief sojourn must have seemed woefully inadequate—stayed for years at a time. A third, much smaller group of artists—including John Gadsby Chapman, William Stanley Haseltine (no. 22), and Charles Caryl Coleman (no. 5)—made their homes in Italy for decades, if not permanently.³ Elihu Vedder (1836–1923) can be counted among this third category of expatriate artists, for whom Italy was far more than a temporary stop or a fleeting interest.

Vedder first visited Italy in 1857, at the age of twenty-one. The young artist saw Rome and Venice but made his long-term home in Florence, where he resided until 1860, when he returned to the United States. From Florence, Vedder made many sketching trips, including visits to Pisa, Lucca, San Gimignano, Volterra, and Siena. On these excursions, Vedder was often accompanied by Giovanni Costa (no. 25), a painter associated with the Macchiaioli, a group of Italian artists committed to the development of plein-air painting. Costa influenced Vedder’s ability to cull subjects from the surrounding landscape, and the artist’s devotion to direct observation prompted Vedder to remark, “I don’t think he [Costa] saw more Nature than I did; but he saw more in Nature to paint than I did.”⁴ He also wrote that Costa “delighted in stealing upon Nature in her most intimate moods—taking her by tradimento [surprise].”⁵

This first taste of Italy provided an artistic wellspring for Vedder, who later wryly recalled this period, writing, “at that time so much Art burst into my unprepared mind that the resulting confusion has lasted me for the rest of my life....”⁶ Although Vedder remained in the United States through the Civil War, Italy provided a constant inspiration for his work. For example, in 1865, he painted The Gloomy Path (no. 4), which depicts a faceless Benedictine monk (identifiable by his black habit) walking through a lonely landscape that resembles the dry and desolate hills of the Crete Senesi, a region of Tuscany southeast of Siena.⁷ Vedder returned to Italy in 1866, this time settling in Rome, where he lived until his death in 1923. Throughout his long career, Vedder never ceased to indulge his penchant for variety, and his considerable oeuvre comprises religious pictures (no. 8), allegorical figures (no. 1), vignettes of the everyday (no. 26), and even intricate still lifes (nos. 34 and 35), among many other subjects.⁸ Although Vedder’s eclectic interests could not be confined to one genre, the Italian landscape never ceased to captivate him, providing constant inspiration for pictures ranging from the documentary to the romantic. Vesuvius (no. 2), for example, presents a beautifully rendered but straightforward view of the volcano from across the Bay of Naples. The artist’s Mt. Colognola, near Perugia (no. 14), on the other hand, is more about sentiment than locale, depicting an anonymous figure walking a rocky path amid an uninviting landscape littered with ruins.

Another longtime American resident of Italy was William Stanley Haseltine (1835–1900). A student of Germany’s Düsseldorf Academy, Haseltine first traveled to Italy in 1856, with fellow artists Emanuel Leutze, T. Worthington Whittredge, and Albert Bierstadt. Haseltine spent two years in Rome before returning to the United States in 1858. As with Vedder, the lure of Italy proved too strong for the artist to resist, and by 1869, Haseltine was back in Rome, where he and his family made their home in a sixteenth-century villa on the Piazza del Gesù. From his base in Rome, Haseltine spent the next two decades traveling and painting throughout Italy and the rest of Europe. Just as his friend Albert Bierstadt applied Düsseldorf aesthetic conventions to the American West, so too did Haseltine bring his academic training to bear upon Italy, painting exquisitely detailed pictures bathed in dramatic light, exemplified by the Coast of Sori (no. 22). Such paintings—fusing Italy’s unique scenery with artistic invention—underscore the natural sublimity of the Italian landscape that provided, for so many American artists, a source of enduring inspiration.
